Children often struggle with their friendships because they do not fully understand them. Author Lorena Siminovich seems to have had this in mind while writing Alex and Lulu: Two of A Kind. Siminovich is an established author and illustrator, as well as the owner of a modern art company, Petit Collage.

Alex and Lulu, a dog and a cat, are best friends who share every part of their day. As the day progresses, Alex and Lulu realize they do not agree on everything. For instance, when it starts to rain, Lulu wants to rush home, but Alex “doesn’t want to stay dry” and wants to take his time; at another point, Alex thinks about playing soccer, but then remembers Lulu doesn’t like soccer because it “squashes” her flowers. Their day continues like this: Lulu is calm and observant, while Alex is active and adventurous.

Siminovich’s illustrations fill the pages with a wide variety of colors and textures. Bright reds and blues are mixed in with polka dots, textured walls and rain puddles, and chalk-like drawings of buildings and furniture. The text is integrated into the illustrations, allowing the reader to delve further into the art.

Alex and Lulu is not only a sweet story of a dog and cat, but also the enchanting tale of a maturing friendship. This book would serve as a great tool for teaching social skills to children. It is simply told and beautifully illustrated, with the ability to provide a child insight into his or her struggles.
