

Goggles & Dust: Images from Cycling's Glory Days

Shelly Horton

Brett Horton

Velo Press (December 2014)

Hardcover $16.95 (120pp)

978-1-937715-29-8

As Europe emerged from the ashes of World War I, cycling, especially stage racing through the countryside and over snowy mountain peaks, united communities and nations. For a continent ravaged by two catastrophic wars, bicycle races like the Tour de France became symbols of strength, courage, and hope, and its heroes became legends in their time.

The races of the early to mid-20th century were far more dangerous, dusty, and difficult than they are today. Then, the popular Tour de France took racers over 5,745 kilometers, or 3,570 miles, with a mere seventeen stages; today's race is about 3,400 kilometers, with twenty-one stages. "It is only when one studies the etched lines on the faces of the riders as they toil up a rutted, muddy mountain road that one appreciates the true difficulty of the era's contests," write Shelly and Brett Horton. "And as we linger over the images, we then notice the joy in the eyes of the fans, both young and old, who stand along those same roads to cheer and encourage their heroes."

Photographs of cycling's legendary champions have become increasingly rare, and the Horton Collection, now amounting to more than 350,000 original racing photographs and negatives, while initially begun to help authenticate their collection of vintage racing jerseys and accessories, has become a veritable treasure trove that documents the sport's glory days. This book, with over 100 expertly restored photographs, brings to life the rigors, triumphs, and soul of competitive cycling in a way that words alone never could.

KRISTINE MORRIS (Winter 2015)

Disclosure: This article is not an endorsement, but a review. The publisher of this book provided free copies of the book to have their book reviewed by a professional reviewer. No fee was paid by the publisher for this review. Foreword Reviews only recommends books that we love. Foreword Magazine, Inc. is disclosing this in accordance with the Federal Trade Commission's 16 CFR, Part 255.