Aspirin-popping tartan-accented Alban Bane pushes his way through the crowd outside San Quentin with an open umbrella. He carries a badge he says he's allowed to be a jerk. Bane's come to witness the execution by lethal injection of an old nemesis Tyler Hayden who tortured and killed 13 youngsters on a spree from Florida to California. Bane had been with the FBI back then. He'd had a wife back then. As Bane watches Hayden die on the gurney IVs strapped to each arm the killer speaks to him: Friend Bane he says. I know who killed your wife.

As much as Bane would like to get to the bottom of that sodium thiopental revelation fresh kills keep getting in the way. Less than 24 hours after the execution Bane is in a chopper in the middle of a snowstorm on the other side of the country. As chief detective for Vermont's Bureau of Criminal Investigation he's been called to the scene of the state's biggest money-maker Mason Place mansion home of the reality TV show Haunted Survivor. There in a sub-basement dangling upside-down from a beam is an "unrecognizable lump that might have been Colin Lorentz television producer." In a murder reminiscent of Tyler Hayden's style the body is shorn of head genitals fingertips identity. Most ominous of all however are the injection marks one on either arm—not like Tyler Hayden's style rather just like the dead Tyler Hayden.
